

Furthermore, I'm not the only person who has come across this issue when job hunting, in "Attention, Employers-This is Employment Discrimination: Do you have a driver's License?"

(<https://www.afb.org/blog/careerconnect-blog/attention-employers-this-is-employment-discrimination-do-you-have-a-drivers-license/12>) Joe Strechay writes, "Recently, I have been hearing from state Vocational rehabilitation counselors, job seekers, and noticed myself- employers are using job descriptions and online application systems with a question similar to this: "Do you have a valid state driver's license?" Strechay goes on to explain that this question can be asked even if there is no connection to driving for the job, and sometimes, there is no way to add additional information, like medical reasons, or just not knowing how to drive, and thus, a person must once again say, "no" to this question.

Then there are times when I just turn in my resume and cover letter, or they don't ask that type of question on the application, so therefore, when I get an automatic email interview offer, it also states to bring in my driver's license, so I have tried calling and asking if the driver's license is used for a background check, and then I once again explain my situation, again I usually hear, "No," or "Yes, we can take that, however you mentioned you have a disability. Do you have reliable transportation to get to work? Click here to read my article on the The perils of community and public transit

(<https://vitalkpodcast.wordpress.com/2018/03/15/the-perrils-of-community-and-public-transit-by-amanda-gene-nelson/>)

I have also tried, going into interviews and when they ask I again explain. So far, I haven't received any offers... So, until I find someone that will see me as a person, not just a person who has a disability and a lack of a driver's license because of that very reason, I continue to reside on unemployment island.